More talkies and less walkies

Jenny Shone is an animal communicator and healer. She has perfected the art of communicating with animals by transferring picture thought patterns to them telepathically and receiving theirs.

By this method of "animal telepathy" she understands their problems - health and behavioural - and not only conveys them to their owners but also creates a better understanding of what is troubling them.

A dog that has started biting and snapping at strangers may have a reason for his erratic behaviour.

Instead of sending your pet away or putting it down, Shone may be able to communicate with your animal to find out what is causing the behaviour change.

She believes her "gift" or method of animal communication can be taught to any animal lover by simply opening their communication channels and developing their intuition.

Shone learnt early on in life as a child that she could communicate with her animals, but she did not really understand how it worked.

She just believed that she had a "special bond" with her animals and that through knowing them well she could anticipate their actions. She did not really believe that they were understanding her thoughts as she was thinking them.

Shone said: "Children are often very good at communicating with animals because they don't have the barriers of cynicism and evaluation. They accept information easily and they don't question it."

"They love with an open heart and animals respond to this.

Shone's inspiration is internal - she is a last resort when conventional methods have failed. "Some people are very sceptical about this, but I have always been a believer in the power of the mind."

"As adults we slip into a superior role and we relate to animals as so called 'clumb' animals and they are surprised to react to our commands."

"The communication is not on a two-way wave level."

"When we open up to receiving the information they give us on a different wavelength then we can better understand our pets and their behaviour."

Shone offers workshops for pet owners based at her rural smallholding near Walkerville outside Johannesburg.

She teaches pet owners how to tune into their pets' conversations and how to understand what they "say".

She says: "We can all become Dr Dolittle. There are more and more people who have come out on international television and confessed to their secret — they do indeed talk to their animals."

Amelia Kinkade, who has written a book called: Straight from the Horse's Mouth.

Shone went to study with Kinkade at the Isle of Man and she has combined what she learnt with a practical reiki "energy healing" course for pet owners.

She believes that pet owners can heal their animals' minor aches and sprains by using energy healing techniques without rushing to the vet.

"I communicate with the animal. I draw healing energy from the universe and I focus the healing energy on the areas which need it most."

Her healing room, a wooden hut in the garden, has crystals and a chart detailing the chakras, or energy centres, of the physical body.

It has an aura of peace and calmness.

"Unfortunately people come to failed, but I like to think that I can help, even at the last stages.

"Sometimes the results will be phenomenal. I had a dog that was on death's doorstep, and after one day it recovered."

"But at other times, animals which are seriously ill do pass away."

"It's important to tell the owners that animals also choose to leave this earth plane," she says.

Shone is also an advocate of the Tellington Touch method, a massage technique for animals that can soothe an agitated animal and can also change behaviour patterns by working on the animal's subliminal consciousness.

Shone believes that our animals really can be our best friends if we allow them to be.

Dogs have often pulled people out of a burning building or Shone says her work as an animal communicator differs from that of animal behaviourists, who base their methods on studies of animals as they would behave in the wild or as they would behave in pecks.

"I think it is important to remember that dogs and cats were once wild animals and they retain some of those wild instincts."

"But more importantly, each animal has an individual personality and they react differently to every situation," says Shone.

Shone can also communicate with your problem pet by working with a photograph. She says that she can telepathically communicate with them and find out what is bugging them and tries to find a solution.

If the problem relates to the owner she phones them with a suggestion.

her horse which had suddenly started reacting unpredictably.

"I communicated with him and discovered that he had a very painful back leg injury, in the tendon."

"The poor animal could not bear any weight on the leg."

"They allowed him time to heal and gave him some medication and he was back to normal, but before that they had been considering shooting him."

Hollywood movies featuring "friendships" between man and animal have always been timeless classics.

Lassie, Black Beauty and Free Willy are examples of these close bonds.

But Shone assures us that each of us can have a special relationship with our own pet if we just make the effort.
